

Some people think that environmental problems are too big for individuals to be solved, while others think that individuals cannot solve these environmental problems unless governments make some action.

Environmental problems have dramatically deteriorated /increased over the last couple of decades. The Rapid increase in population and other problems such as pollution, deforestation and global warming have exacerbated the situation. There are is two tow different ideas about how to deal with this issue. Some reason that individuals could reduce/decrease these problems, but some others argue that these obstacles are too complicated major to be managed/manipulated by people. I suppose it is a mutual responsibility for both individuals and governments to take pragmatic measures for their solutions.

Over-population is one of the pivotal issues that have detrimental effects on the environment. Demand for food resources, living space and other necessities for life will proliferate with population increase. For instance, many forests have been wiped out for people's accommodation and to fulfill the need of living space. This has caused/lead to intensely destructive consequences both for the people and the environment. In this situation for example, if governments make a decision to diminish the rubbish produced daily, they cannot do much. However, if the citizens attempt/take effort on a from their personal level, the rubbish production could be controlled/restricted/minimized governed tremendously.

Pollution is also a great menace to the environment. It is not only the cause of environmental difficulties, but also has dire effects efficacies on citizens. Factories have been operated amid cities and they exhale dangerous smoke and other noxious/fatal toxicants, which they are affecting the people's health enormously. Moreover, pollution also contributes to in global warming. these are no longer national issues and all governments around the world should work together to reduce this-these pressing obstacles and people should be encouraged and participated in to makinge the world a better place(to live in).

After analyzing the situation, I would like to say that environmental problems should be considered/ addressed on a the-large scale, so .-So it is significant important that the governments have an initiative to tackle detract environmental problems, but the effort would not go far further without the collaboration of the individuals.
