

As children become adults, their social behavior changes in some ways. What are the main differences between young children's social behavior and that of adults? To what extent are the changes that take place good?

As children grow up many changes happens in many aspects of their life during their growth. These changes are including include physical and emotional development of which these two main changes result in key differences in social behavior and psychological changes differences between children and adults. In this essay I am trying to give my viewpoints s in this regard along with some related examples.

One of the main bold characteristics of a child is his honesty. Children most often freely talk about their needs, feelings and emotions while adults are unable to express themselves as-of_ like children. In fact adults in most cases of course have several masks that prevent them from behaving naturally. As an example most probably we can remember a occasions when a child wants to talk and ask for something but his parents stop him in any way. I myself was witness in many occasions a child just wanted to ask for another glass of coke and his parents and even an older sibling stopped him.

The other difference in social behavior of adults in comparison to children is that children easily fall out and reconcile with in a way that nothing has happened, while I believe this is a complicated case for adults. We, as adults, definitely can remember such cases in our personal and professional life let alone cases the case which have lasted for a life. To show a very clear example of such behavior is the cold relation between Iran and the United States during the last 38 years in which the Iranian leaders cannot forget about what happened in 1332 and some other forgivable cases that to me are not that unforgivable.

To make a long story short, I can say that I personally believe that the changes I mentioned above are destructive attitudes. I wish adults could retain most of their childhood social behaviors. I believe if adults could treat others like children, the world would be a better place to live in.
