

People attend college or university for many different reasons (new experiences, career preparation, increased knowledge). Why do you think people attend college or university? Use specific reasons and examples to support your answer.

The first thing that comes to mind when someone is attending a college or university is why he is doing so. We are all aware of the high tuitions of these institutes; moreover, if you attend one of them you are likely to spend about four years of your life in them which is something that shouldn't be taken flippantly, so everyone wants to know what's going to happen to these huge investments. There are many reasons for attending a university like increasing knowledge, someone's family's encouragement and even just enjoying the atmosphere of a university. Though the most important reason, in my opinion, is getting a better job in the future.

Let's face it! if you want a decent/good economic/~~economical~~ and social status in the current world, you must have a college degree. Some might point out few people that succeeded in their life's without one, but that's the point; the few are the exception, (?) not the rule.

When you study in a college, there will be a whole new world of opportunities open for you. You can be a scientist, engineer or study management and eventually become a prestigious, six-figure salary CEO! While-while if you don't, you will be a plumber, janitor or a police officer, and even many of these occupations need education. All of those jobs are beneficial and necessary for society, but they usually involve a lot of toil and they are not highly paid; in other words, the jobs are not simply worth it. Besides, they usually involve doing something over and over again so they are utterly boring.

At last, it's worth mentioning that, we should respect all jobs equally and try not to disrespect offend any job since we need them all; however, a degree can help us have an easier, better paid and (a) more exciting job.
