

Many countries are spending too much money on training a few individuals for international sports competitions. Some people think that governments should invest more in ordinary people instead. Do you agree or disagree? Give your opinion and examples.

A remarkable state expenditure is allocated to sports activities in all countries every year. However, proportions of costs which are reserved for public sport versus few people who are preparing for the world championship has sparked a heated debate among critics.

The Brilliant performance of national athletes in international competitions is surprisingly of particular importance for statesmen, inasmuch as the public will be astonishingly presented ed with happiness and the sense of glory by such accomplishments. This is one of the known methods which they pursue to bring their efficient operation into the limelight. Therefore, governments are enthusiastic to consume most of the budget which is approved for sports purposes to entice and exercise nationally well-performed persons who ~~are~~ are expected to achieve higher world ranks.

On the other hand, many critics believe that if governments stick to this arrangement, soon there will be no more sports heroes as a consequence of cutting down the needed investment in sports fundamentals. They assert that nurturing champions starts from early ages. Indeed, sports authorities should be keen on educating athletes from primary schools at the community level and keep on finding the potential talents and skills among all individuals. Therefore, they must spend a bigger portion of the sports budget in all layers of society and put the chance of thriving in access of ordinary people.

I strongly believe that governmental authorities in the field of sports department should strike a balance between championship expenses and popular sporting expenditure, meaning that they should care about people's exercising and prepare facilities to lead them to do physical activities everyday as well as they are concerned ed about ~~for~~ national athletes' practices and awards. In fact, if they are interested in educating a new generation of athletes for international competitions /events, they should invest in training and preparing sports supplies for ordinary people.

To conclude, training individuals for international sports events is as serious as getting ready infrastructures for the general public and giving people the opportunity to rise and shine or at least be magnificently healthier human beings.
