

In recent years some countries have experienced very rapid economic development. This has resulted in much higher standards of living in urban areas but not in the countryside. This situation may bring some problems for the country as a whole. What are these problems? How might they be reduced?

Although the economic growth has raised the standards of living in developing countries in recent years, it could negatively impact the countryside. In the same way, centralizing the facilities would entail far-reaching implications for the urban living.

First of all, people from the countryside will try to move to large cities to benefit from numerous possibilities which ~~exist there are~~ in these cities such as a wide range of job opportunities. This issue except having overpopulation matter would yield a variety of other problems, that is to say congested roads, incessant roar and staggering traffic which definitely would increase the exhaust fumes and subsequently it would cause some health problems.

Secondly, ~~through excessive settlement of rural people in megacities, by residing people in developed cities excessively~~, not only would the urban areas be affected, but also it will generate some inevitable problems in rural areas. ~~With the decline in~~ ~~By decreasing~~ the population ~~of the villages in countryside~~ the first thing that would be harmed is the agricultural ale products. When nobody is there for cultivating and harvesting crops gradually animal husbandry and the agriculture industry would ruin, consequently it would necessitate importing some products from abroad to ~~meet demands satisfy some people's requirements~~. However, most people probably would be consumers which what gradually leads to a consumerist society.

In conclusion, by decentralizing facilities, conversely, considering some possibilities, namely educational, recreational and commercial centers in rural areas, not only would it balance both areas, but also all people relatively similarly could benefit from a high standards of living.
