Politician are most responsible for protection of the environment than individuals. To what extent do you agree or disagree.

These days our planet suffers from its residents' harmful activities, so it is a must to have a plan to preserve it. While some believe that it is statesmen's obligation to preserve the earth, others claim that it is incumbent on all the inhabitants to take care of this duty. From my perspective, governments and people should assume equal responsibility in this regard.

On the one hand, my personal conviction is that governments play a vital role in conserving the earth. They are able to introduce stringent laws into saving the surroundings. For instance, they can levy high tax on plastics' producers or provide tax incentives for factories which manufacture Hybrid or Electrical vehicles means instead of fossil-fuel ones. In addition, politicians can support cultural activities which raise awareness regarding ~~to~~ nature conservation. For example, by giving non-repay loans to producers they can pave the way for making documentaries which show drawbacks of hunting and poaching and back the corporations which are active in harvesting renewable energies.

On the other hand, individuals' contribution in preservation of Mother Earth is a decisive factor. I strongly hold the opinion that politicians' programs would not be effective if individuals did not endorse their decisions. Simply put, the more contribution from individuals in conservation programs, the higher possibility for preserving the planet. For instance, people can get behind the factories which produce electrical cars or ~~ban~~ stores which offer plastic products ~~staffs~~. Therefore, they force producers to follow governments' strategies.

As a conclusion, I believe that protection of the surrounding is a national responsibility and it would be totally wrong if we disclaim obligation from one side. In other words, individuals and governments supplement each other in the case of nature conservation.
