When it comes to the subjects of people's concerns about their offspring, it goes without saying that even though the diversity of the playthings the youngsters use could lead to a wider range of the things they learn, this should not be carried to extremes, for it has its detriments as well.

Taking only the profit and loss of the children into consideration regardless of the unbalance in families' economy such purchases would bring, any excessive behaviour/practice overdo in acquiring playthings-stuff only gives rise to the children's uncertainty about what to play with. For instance, in my eyes my cousin's daughter suffers such confusion. She really can't choose the thing she wants to play with, that is why her room dorm is always messy in a way that doubles her indecision. This She brings brought me to another idea which is that teenagers rs-ones will find a bedroom more difficult to tidy than it indeed must be. Moreover, comparing with to other children who may normally have a narrower more normally variety of toys, excessive toys will cause the children to come across as arrogant full of themselves. What is more, since these "princes and princesses" have easy access to whatever they want, they will hardly enjoy accomplishments and progresses made in their future life. This could be one of the reasons for the rise in the population of the depressed.

Games can upgrade children's abilities and potentials. Therefore, a rational diversity in the games children are engaged playing with could be a thing for them to make profit of. The visual, auditory and touching capacities of a child will develop due to this diversity. This could be simply observed in differences between generations with different toys.
