

Visitors should follow local customs and behaviors or the host country should welcome cultural differences?

Which one do you support and why?

It has always been always highly debatable whether tourists to other countries should abide by the respective rules and customs ~~the host country~~ or the host country should be accustomed with their cultural differences. Since travelling allows us to ~~is meant to~~ visit new things/sites, places therefore, following the local customs is far preferable.

First of all, Travelling is a good opportunity to try new things/experiences such as traditional cuisines, music and customs and those who just travel to view landscapes waste a perfect chance to learn something new. If they aim to meet just the same customs or other aspects of their own themselves' culture, it is questionable why they have intended to visit other places in the first place? Then again, the ignorance of the local customs might lead to a big problem since it is disrespectful to the ~~an~~ other culture. Furthermore, if individuals comply with the local customs of others in its respective places, it means mutual understanding to each other.

Secondly, encountering other cultures, not only will ~~it~~ not ~~to~~ bring about a culture shock but also it will entail many positive impacts on our culture or even our demeanors. For example, having traveled to a country such as Japan ~~Japan~~ which where it is well-known as a country whose people are punctual, the visitors thereafter prize ~~for~~ time. On the other hand, these differences and contradictions are the main reasons why which travelers are motivated by to travel and visit them. The stranger more odd and strange the cultural features are, the more interesting it is for visitors.

In conclusion, observing the traditions of the host country could pave the way for enhancing the tourist attractions and also preserving the cultural heritage of those places. Besides, it is an invaluable and interesting experience which visitors could bring as a souvenir.
