

Many people leave their homes in the countryside to live in large cities

What factors make people want to move to the city? How realistic is it to control the numbers of people moving to the city?

Throughout history, humans have been seeking better life conditions due to their inherent nature characters. Although it has several benefits for individuals and it is not void of profits for a distant city, the quality of life in the host country probably degrades as a result of growing population. In this essay, I will attempt to indicate factors which consequently lead to local immigration. Besides, we will have a brief argument around the issue of controlling this entrance.

On the one hand, there are varieties of push factors leading to immigration. Natural disasters, food crisis, low incomes and lack of educational facilities and welfare. Most of the rural areas especially in developing countries suffer from the lack of primary life condition. Therefore, their citizens prefer to live in an area which guarantees their foods, pure water and their job prospective.

On the other hand, the impacts of pull factors are undeniable. People are seeking a better labor market, higher wages and living standard, leave their hometown and immigrate to the urban areas. Furthermore, the desirable level of accommodation and recreational facilities are ~~enough~~ attractive enough to give up their father's land and look for a better life.

Personally, I believe that it is ~~not~~ both unrealistic and inhumane humanitarian to limit the movement invasion of population from rural areas to urban ones. Everybody has the right to utilize their country's facilities ~~as~~ equally to their counterparts. The only measure to control urban sprawl associated with local immigration is to distribute facilities fairly all around the country.

To sum up, despite the increasing megacities' population, it is not fair to stop rural people from entering cities. The only way is to deliberate on the reasons of local immigration and offer solutions in preference to this illogical control.
