

Some people are of the opinion that prisons are basically universities of crime, fostering the kind of behavior they aim to eradicate, and are, not effective. Others feel that prison life is not hard enough. Discuss the arguments on both sides of the issue. What is your own opinion on the matter?

The use of jail as a means of combatting to combat crime has always been a matter of debates and even becoming more so as a result of prison 's population growth and crimes become more violent.

Some people believe that prisons are merely a breeding ground for of criminals thus, they are not going to do the job that they are supposed to. Their finger is pointing to the incidence of reoffending among former jailbirds/inmates and the rise in the seriousness of felony committed by them. A young person imprisoned for a minor crime and comes out equipped with the skills to commit more serious ones. Consequently, if the internment/incarceration/imprisonment is wherefore deter people from harming society, this progress is not working properly.

Whilst By contrast, others argue that jails are not harsh enough. In their view inmates in-mates lead a life of luxury inside at the expense of the taxpayers. They cited that keeping prisoners inside will cost a great deal of money for the government. In addition, from their perspective prison is a soft penalty for culprit's guilty's felony. If they know that the consequence of their crime would not be dreadful, offenders s will not be deterring from committing that again.

I am personally inclined to agree with the latter viewpoint. Although, to enact the tougher penalties tougher by regime with no sentence of remission is not a perfect panacea to all prisoners, it would be able to decrease the number of crimes happening. Furthermore, making jailbirds busy by giving them responsibilities, for instance giving them community services jobs on their leisure time and enhance their awareness by courses which related to how harmful crimes could be to society, might be helpful.
