

Individuals can do nothing to change society. Any new developments can only be brought about by governments and large institutions. How far do you agree or disagree.

As a matter of fact, people mostly blame governments for the lack of social security and low standards of living; nevertheless, people know deep inside that they themselves play a key role in all kinds of developments of their nation. Furthermore, governments are shaped by the individuals. As a result, both individuals and governments should accompany each other in order to prepare a healthier community conditions.

On one hand, individuals occasionally find it impossible to bring about any developments to society which is on the contrary absolutely detrimental to ~~the~~ society. For instance, the Azadi tower, formerly known as Shahyad, was designed by the architect Hosein Amanat about half a century ago. Afterwards, the government provided funds to build it and now the whole country benefits from an individual's one's idea. In fact, neither do individuals benefit from just nagging about the problems, nor do governments achieve any functional ideas.

On the other hand, by the same token, governments play a tremendous part in due to dealing with social problems. Therefore, large institutions which ~~are~~ owning the implements should spare no efforts protecting people from social issues. For instance, steps to address the issue such as setting up counselling sessions designed to increase people's awareness and to promote moral values must be taken by these huge organizations which are again valueless/worthless if they these are not taken seriously by people.

Although, both governments and people have made progresses in social developments separately, bringing about beneficial changes is not feasible if individuals and governments do not cooperate ~~in~~ from my perspective.