Some people believe that governments should pay full course fees for students who want to study in universities. Do you agree or disagree with this statement? Give your own opinion and examples.

Without doubt governments should make the pave for who are intelligent. So, they should charge fees. Educated adults play a key role in having safe, secure and respectful environment.

Although in the past education belonged to royalty or superior position, nowadays societies understand the importance of knowledge. Whereas critics said that this kind of support of social committee/students should have directed talented (person), but advocates believe that not only should they pay skillful (person/intelligent person), they should have considered all members of society. Furthermore, the U.S. have funded even foreign university students who have been educated there and it is evidence of the importance of senior education. Students are required to study in peaceful atmosphere.

Needless to say, in Mazlo's pyramid, nurturing is one of our primary needs. In this end the government should pay full course fees for students especially university students. Paying tuitions fire students' enthusiasm for doing their best and it may lead to lots of scientific or technological achievements. However, students have arisen from poverty-stricken families. Besides, poor families tend to prevent their children from continuing their education due to tuitions. I know some genius students that they could not continue their educations/ ban from educating just because of their poor families/ their poverty. Depriving from continuing education, students are faced with disappointment and it has not been fair.

In conclusion, if I were a politician, I would put interest in providing facilities for students in each section for continuing their educations, thus the government should dedicate budget to support students, otherwise society particularly scientific society faced with leakage of capable students.
