Although many countries are becoming richer, these societies still have members who are poor and struggle each day to survive.

Why do you think this happens and what can wealthy societies do to help their poorer citizens?

Despite the fact that many countries are getting wealthier, there are still many people in these communities, who live below the poverty line, and they quite literally cannot afford their essential needs.

Undoubtedly, numerous factors can be considered the underlying reasons in this regard. First and foremost, unfair/unequal distribution of wealth among different classes of society is the conspicuous reason. In many communities, a great deal/a large number of financial resources are concentrated on ~~beyond~~ some sections of society. As a matter of fact the upper-class involves such arrogant individuals who tend to exclude others benefiting from budgetary considerations. Although they have even more than enough money, they are too ~~such~~ greedy ~~to fail~~ to assist the poor financially.

There are some proper ways to aid the people who cannot meet their needs. The most obvious solution is paving the way for teaching them some practical skills in order ~~to~~ that they could benefit from them for making more money. A further step is for the government to provide/create some job opportunities so that the rate of unemployment will decrease, which leads to them meeting their essential demands much easier than before.

In conclusion, ~~if~~ the government and some relevant organizations should introduce laws to give the financial provisions out equally, thereby narrowing the gap between the rich and the poor. However, people, especially the well-off can take action of their own accord so that they can help their fellow citizens ~~having~~ have/lead/to have/to lead more comfortable life.
