

Most countries develop their economies to improve living standards. Some people are afraid that it will cause degradation of important social values. Do you think advantages of this trend outweigh its disadvantages?

Governments have always tried to fulfill the zeal for the provision of higher life quality for their citizens by implementing various measures to boost their economy. Whereas some tend to criticize demolishing of moralities inside society as the result of this development, I strongly opine that such drawbacks are not noticeable compared to its enormous benefits.

Since moral values have changed in form or appearance, many might assume that they have disappeared Altogether. Altered their traditional methods, moral values might be wrongly portrayed to be neglected. As a result of living in a fast-pace competitive world, people just have to adapt themselves to the inevitable struggles of a hectic lifestyle. Nevertheless, the majority of them still are abiding by abying positive attitudes individually. Values such as, kindness, share and honestly. Not only are many volunteers the members of non-profit organizations on a full-time basis, many more do some sort of philanthropy activities online through social networks. Namely, fund raising and raising public consciousness about miscellaneous issues like poverty or child labor.

That a successful economy could benefit all members of society is not indisputable. On a personal level, people regardless of age and their social class could take advantage of improvements in both urban and rural infrastructures, health insurances, medical facilities and modern internationally confirmed educational methods in schools. In other words, what this approach brings about is the long-term citizens' satisfaction in that they could enjoy the safety and peace provided by their governments. What is more, the higher GDP, the more budget for scientific researches which might be beneficial for the whole globe. For example, allocating time and cost to for finding water on other planets s may guarantee the mankind's future life in spite of the fact that it may seems useless in the short run/a short-period.

In brief, from my perspective, a developed economy plays a vital role in the prosperity of a nation in various levels. Therefore, it should definitely be a must for governments to try to achieve it for the sake of their countries.