

There are many types of music in the world today. Why do we need music? Is the traditional music of a country more important and should it be preserved or is international music that is heard everywhere nowadays more useful to a society?

Music is an inevitable part of humans' life and it could be classified in various genres. Whereas I believe the conventional music style plays a major role in keeping various their related cultures alive, I concur that as a result of modern life circumstances, multi-national songs could be more contributing in terms of conveying moralities.

What listening to music brings about is a form of escapism. It could detach its listeners from their routine as well as completely change inge their moods. People regardless of age could enjoy the rhythm and the sound of miscellaneous instruments individually or with others in a concert; from my own experience, listening to Gypsy king is always refreshing. What is more, music has always been an inseparable part of religious or spiritual ceremonies in that it could raise the participants' passion or stimulate their sense of sympathy both on in joyous and gloomy occasions. From another point of view, it is a brilliant opportunity that would enable artists to have positive impacts on their fans; namely Pink Floyd or Queen who their whose deeply well-written songs lead the respective young generation of that time to think more critically.

That traditional music is often portrayed to be a major factor in keeping languages and their related cultures away from extinction especially local ones such as regional Persian music like Kurdish folklore. However, I opine that in this technologically ever-growing era, the internet brings s people closer. People, the youth to be exact, throughout the globe have similar taste and prefer to listen to the same newly released songs s from pop to rap. Therefore, the more meaningful these songs, the higher the chance of developing positive attitudes. For instance, singers like John Lennon or Michael Jackson have created songs which not only transformed their concerns about the world peace, which are memorized by millions of people, they also triggered them to get involved in philanthropic activities.

In brief, although the necessity of preserving traditional music of each country is undeniable and definitely is a must, the world-wide types of contemporary music would be more influential.
