

Education is not a luxury but a basic human right and as such should be free for everyone irrespective of personal wealth. Do you agree or disagree?

It is believed that education is a human right and cannot be considered ~~as~~ a luxury. As a result, it should be free for everyone regardless of personal wealth. I strongly agree with this idea and believe that governments should consider this issue in at higher levels.

First of all, education is a necessity for every individual ~~person~~, regardless of their race, nationality, beliefs and economic level. It is totally wrong to categorize people for being able to study and attend the school. As long as education is considered a basic human right, it should not belong to a certain group of people it should not be a privilege peculiar to a certain class. Public schools should be supported by governments to provide an acceptable level of education. School principals should not ask parents about their financial situation and require money for school registration. When governments invest money in ~~an~~ education, not only will individuals benefit from free education, but also the country can take advantage of ~~benefits from~~ having more educated people. As a result therefore more qualified workforce will be provided for ~~to the~~ society.

On the other hand, private schools can continue their job, but that is only an option for those who prefer to pay money for education. For instance, some parents want their children to study in a more isolated environment with fewer students in the class. However, studying in a public school is a good opportunity for children to meet their peers /children from different cultures and economic levels strata, so this will help their social skills to improve.

In conclusion, I agree with free education as it ~~both~~ benefits both individuals and society. The more educated a country is, the more it grows. I Hope no one has to pay for education anywhere in the world.
