

Whether someone achieves their goal or not is a question of luck. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

These days some new beliefs have become popular among individuals most of whom. ~~Most of them~~ assume that their achievements are tied to how lucky they are in life and they do not have any ability to manage their situations. On the other hand, some others frown upon this opinion and assert that people are directly responsible for the implications of their deeds.

Some sources of energy are in the universe that may positively or negatively affect people's life and besides the nature of sort of their effects is are based on people's attitude. For instance, some greedy or jealous members of the public who look down on people and tend not to see others' crowning achievements receive negative energy regularly as opposed to others who are generous toward people and are exposed to positive energy.

I, personally, believe that hardworking individuals who are really truly assertive in their life get higher positions s in society regardless of whether they are lucky or not. What is more, not only should people choose their goals/destinations with regard to their ability and their preferences, but also they should consider their background. In other words, to make a worthwhile decision both previous conditions s and feasible future should be considered. Another notable issue is associated with the importance of shouldering our responsibility. Researchers believe that people who shirk their s responsibilities or give up their goals are not capable of progressing in their life. The more organized is a person, being an organized person, the more the likelihood of being successful in life. It means that if people had a schedule in their life and planned their time, they would more easily easier grab possible opportunities and tackle their problems. In addition, they would take more advantages from their life.

To put in a nutshell, most people, myself included, claim that superstitious beliefs such as being lucky or not are an escaping way for lazy individuals from challenges in life because they just rely on their chance which is an undeniably unacceptable way of thinking.
