

Many nations like to host international sporting events, but people are against it them. Describe both views and give your own opinion.

Hosting an international sport event such as World Cup or Olympic has lots of attractions for many people, while some others are of the idea that spending budgets on such affairs is just wasting of both time and money.

It goes without saying that, hosting an internationally tremendous event like Olympics demands so many facilities such as hotels, stadiums, hospitals, restaurants, means of transportation and security. It is crystal clear that not only does providing such facilities consumes a huge amount of budget, but also requires so much time, and that is why officials who are in charge of execution of such events start injection of special budgets from inside and absorb foreign investment from outside in advance. However, the mentioned facilities will remain for that country, and definitely will improve the standard of living for that nation. These preparations create so many jobs, and make that country known to people around the globe. Tourists start visiting those countries even after end of that international event. (puts sth on the map)

On the other hand, those who are against hosting these kinds of events reason that the budgets could instead be spent in-on infrastructural projects. For example, in Brazil where the World Cup took place some years ago, people were protesting against the expenditure of government on stadiums where people did not have basic needs such as appropriate housing or clean water to drink. The ones who are against of hosting international sports events in their homeland claim that the jobs created are just temporary jobs, and they the facilities which are built will remain empty or unused after the end of those events.

To make a long story short, I think hosting an international event in general demands an extremely big amount of time and money which is beyond the means of out of scope of work of developing countries. I think the more expenditure to be prepared for such events in the undeveloped countries, the more drawbacks will be expected. I believe although holding an international sport event in-is something unforgettable, poor countries are highly recommended that they to spend their limited national budget on their infrastructures.
