It is generally believed that some people are born with certain talents, for instance for sport or music, and others are not. However, it is sometimes claimed that child can be taught to become a good sports person or musician.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

Different children have different talents for various activities. One child may have fantastic talents for sports and someone may have more potential to become a musician or an artist. A growing number of people believe that genetic inheritance is essential to achieve success, while others argue that any child can be taught particular skills.

To begin with, every child reflects their abilities at the infant stage. It paves the way for parents deciding their life path. For instance, playing piano like a professional, a two years old child among the siblings with the same cares proves that people have inborn talent which is undeniable. Confidently, a child cannot learn such a skill at the age of two.

On the contrary, most of the children do not have outstanding inborn talents. They might have potentials but that cannot be explored until they are engaged in a certain field. To make the word more beautiful and enriched, it is incumbent on parents to promote different innate abilities of their offspring and assist them making their future more prosperous. Neither ~~does is~~ it beneficial to children themselves nor to the parents and the country if the natural talents of a particular field get ruined.

To conclude, talent makes many people stand out of others. However, training, dedication and the environment are also required to be really good in areas such as sports or art. In my opinion, nature and nurture both have the equal role to play for a child to become a successful professional and there is fine line between these two phenomena.
