

Every year thousands of students go overseas to study. Although many benefit from the experience, others go home disappointed.

In developing countries it has become widespread that students tend to take participate in educational programs held in developed countries for strong reasons. Furthermore, those who enjoy having overseas studies in their resume take pride themselves on their precious experience. This essay focuses on the heated argument as to whether going abroad brings the students any advantages or not.

First and foremost, graduate education authorities are concerned about those students who intend to return to their home countries, but when their educational course finishes they become reluctant to go back. Taking all the academic facilities along with the state-of-the-art laboratory equipment and technology on board, a large number of students will be willing to serve in the country from which they graduate. This is the major obsession for Science and Technology Ministry's officials, regarding those faculty members who were quite eager to take a sabbatical.

In contrast, going overseas to study pivots to a great degree on the remarkable experiences students acquire. If there is a possibility for the students to enroll in either a European or American university, this certainly raises their awareness of how to conduct the required researches for their own country's development. Apart from that, the participants will be familiar with up-to-date teaching skills and the way leading universities are linked with industry.

Other experts, also, point to the achievements the students gain in collaboration with well-known scientists working at a famous university in the world. This will probably result in making establishing/developing relations with highly established professors which in turn may lead to working on shared projects which better benefit the developing countries. Regardless of the transferring technology, cooperation with an international university may cause a developing country's college to win fame and obtain a higher position in the world ranking.

In conclusion, from my perspective, although overseas education may be accompanied by minor drawbacks, its advantages seem to outweigh the downsides provided the officials (who are) in charge make attempt to utilize it as a means to achieve significant attainments.
