

Some people think that it is necessary to travel another country to learn about it. Others argue that all the information is available on TV and the Internet. Discuss both the views and give your own opinion.

These days traveling around the world is more convenient than the past for most people, whereas some prefer to stay at home and take a trip around the world by the Internet and Google Earth. Although the information is available in both, it seems that the quality is completely different for each of us.

There is one group of people who believe in ~~to~~ travelling and learning new things directly and discuss that their perception will be completely distinct when they observe new phenomena closely. They express that apart from the sight ability, some senses like taste, smell, or even touch have beneficial effects on the quality of understanding and creating a clearer image in our mind. For instance, when you read about the Mediterranean weather in a book or article, event~~t~~ with a detailed explanation, you are not able to figure out it exactly unless you can be there and take a breath. In addition, experience lovers cite some aspects of knowledge which are gained by communication and in person. For example, when you visit a place and communicate with local people, even with making gestures, you will discover some unwritten facts about cultures and humanity.

On the other hand, there are some who prefer to stay at home and watch the world from others' eyes. These people usually do not have time to travel or would rather ~~to~~ avoid some financial and non-financial costs. It is obvious that reading a book or surfing the net is cheaper than traveling and also from a non-economic perspective, the less we travel, the less pollution is produced. Moreover, having new experiences on a trip requires tolerance, acceptance and understanding and thus for someone without these abilities remaining at home is more comfortable.

In conclusion, while some people have to spend their money and time ~~for~~ traveling and tolerate some unexpected events, these are costs that they pay to satisfy their senses and be more experienced than others.
