As well as making money, businesses also have social responsibilities. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Today, even though earning money is a significant issue in ~~terms of~~ the business world, social responsibilities are another aspect which should be considered. ~~To some extent, I agree with this argument.~~

For better or worse, we live in a society that is significantly influenced by economic tasks. Money is a fundamental element for every business and it is a testament to successful remaining. To put this issue in perspective, if a company could not meet its financial needs it would not be able to fulfill their targets~~broaden its horizon~~ in ~~the~~ other areas such as social obligations, so it would eliminate its efficiency. Also, making money is a main goal in every company and it has many beneficial results in society. For example, it can create ~~the~~ job opportunities for the vast majority of people and therefore, the economic level of society can be developed.

Secondly, having social responsibilities in the businesses can cause a healthy atmosphere in the working environments. The more employees see their companies involved in social causes ~~encounter with companies social obligations~~ the more they can ~~they~~ trust them, so the organization's efficiency may be increased. On the other hand, by contributing to ~~in~~ charity works businesses do not have to pay taxes. One of the textbook examples in this regard is ORS's donation of $15000 on cancer researches in 2006 for tax evasion~~as to running from $600000 tax~~.

In conclusion, although making money is an important factor in different businesses, social obligations play a key role in their successes. Also, both a friendly job environment and accounting loopholes are the results of companies' social responsibilities.
