Some people think that spending a lot on holding wedding parties, birthday parties and other celebrations is just a waste of money. Others, however, think that these are necessary for individuals and society. Discuss both views and give your opinion.

Nowadays it is often claimed that throwing a party is very important and should be celebrated grandly. Contrary to this popular belief, there are still those who argue that parties like marriage are an important custom not only for individuals but also for society.

On the one hand, parties have been held for several reasons. Parties are good places for families to gather together and have a good time with their relatives. For instance, every family has great photos which were taken in family parties and shows best moments in their life. Many people believe that parties actually create value and it is important to hold it in the best way. By spending limited money it is almost impossible to hold a memorable event. Only when people allocate a lot of money, will they achieve something special that will be remembered forever.

On the other hand, there are other ways to celebrate important events that may have greater value rather than spending too much money. For example going to on a family trip and spending a good time with immediate family or intimate friends. Besides, there many people who live under starvation and need help. The money (which is)spentding on celebrations can be sent to them. Hence, a few individuals refute to spend a huge amount of money on personal celebrations.

On the basis of the points mentioned above, I am inclined to believe that although parties are a form of social event and many people consider them special moments in their life, other choices should be considered in order to save their money and use it in better ways like helping people who do not have enough food to eat for a single meal a day.
