

It is the parents' responsibility and not the schools' to teach children moral values.

Who is most responsible for children's moral education and what is the best way to teach wrong from right?

Amin

Without any doubt, both parents and the education system play a major role in establishing the character of individuals who grow up through the teaching processes devised by them. This essay focuses on the heated debate as to who influences children's upbringing to a higher degree, especially in the responsibility of making them distinguish between right values from wrong ones as well as the most efficient method to adopt.

One group of experts s urge that it is the school which impacts the personality of children. Regarding the time taken for children to interact with the education system, a number of authorities in the government adhere to the view that the teachers should take the responsibility of helping them to learn ethics fundamentals. The officials arguably state that children will not sufficiently be aware of moral values, unless they realize the outcomes resulting from their perception of wrong and right values.

The other part of society, however, believe that parents are most likely to be accountable to raise their children's awareness of what is yielded as a result of wrong choices to make. Taking the parents into account as the first people children cultivate relationship with since they are born, some psychologists essentially maintain that children tend to assume their parents as their heroes in their small world. What it easily brings to mind, consequently, is that even every single action the parents take has a direct influence on their children's understanding of ethics, due, in large part, to their tendency to mimic what they observe in their surroundings.

On the other hand, the answer simply comes to light if we consider parents to be more concerned about the approach their children choose to behave. If a person, for instance, follows a career which is inconsistent with an environment in which he has grown up, it is a given that his parents will be more influenced d by his choice.

To put in a nutshell, the responsibility of teaching children moral values should be held on parents' shoulder at-in the first place, owing to the roles they y reflect on their children's future life. Besides, in my estimation, the best way in this respect lies behind parents' behavior because children learn as they see how their parents behave.
