

I ~~am~~ definitely agree with this view but I can't say that men couldn't be good parents. If we put the exceptions away, totally women are better at parenting. Because we have seen many cases who have raised the greatest children even alone /single-handedly, and have ~~been~~ proved the exact opposite exactly opposed of this theory. I believe that some factors cause women ean to be better at this important duty such as society and woman's nature.

I definitely believe that most ~~of the~~ societies have more expectation from women especially in doing chores and moral behaviors like raising children, nursing, tolerating, understanding, kindness/compassion/being kind, more than expecting of them to makeing money for family expenditures /provide for the family. Totally ~~this these~~ pressures make women ~~to be~~ more careful about their role in raising children and their civility. Of course this role would become bold in absence of father.

girls have softer reactions in comparison with their boy-male counterparts after birth with environmental actions. This elegance is their characteristic which has ~~transmitted~~ been transferred to our new generation from our predecessors as mentioned we talked in the previous paragraph. women are kinder and more compassionate . They have a special love for and dependency to-on their child from the first moments of their pregnancy from then on period until ever-then. The love of a mothers is a pure sense which distinguishes ~~them-her with from~~ that in a fathers. Also a child has this dependency to-on her and we can't deny this in sum, all of these elements together have affected women and these limpid /pure gins-genes inherited from generation by generation to us. However although mothers are better parents, fathers are great parents too and the role of parents ~~doesn't is not~~ completed without one of them. In the growing process of child rearing, we need to see them both beside each other for a more impressive result to define its identification.
