

There are recently been movements to boycott products imported from countries that tolerate the exploitation of underage workers. Using specific examples, explain why you support or oppose such boycott?

A new ~~trade-trend~~ to boycott imported products which are made by underage workers has ~~been~~ started in today's world. In first world nation countries, the cost of labors for ~~productionproducing~~ activity is overrated, so companies start to invest in developed countries such as Thailand, India, Indonesia, ~~the~~ Philippines and Bangladesh to pay less for production. In these countries the majority of society are under the poverty line and because of mismanagement children are forced to work and provide for their families. Unfortunately, most of these children are underage and work for long hours with low pay.

Since it's a fact that big companies like Apple and Nike are famous enough and have ~~worldwidecross-world~~ advertisements, ~~hence~~ controlling people ~~not~~ to ~~not~~ buy these products is not possible. Groups of activists believe the more demand there is, the more children work, but I believe individual boycotts ~~does~~ not work and we should go for better solutions to support those children.

All the three ~~aspectsparties~~, ~~that is to say~~, governments, companies, ~~and~~ families are lie with this issue. First of all, governments of developed countries gain huge ~~profits~~ from investment of big companies. Authorities should make tough rules and put high-rate taxes for exporting these products to stop governments.

Companies should be under investigation and there should be ~~re~~strict rules to overcharge companies which invest in these sweatshops. At the same time, governments should put lower ~~rates~~ of importing tax for companies which work with worker-friendly suppliers to motivate companies.

I opine, it's ~~incumbentcombat~~ on governments to provide free education and teach families ~~that~~ if these children become literate, ~~they~~ can make more money to help them.

In conclusion, child labor is a global issue and all nations must stand against and solve it to make our world a better place for living.
