"Prevention is better than cure"

Out of a country's health budget, a large proportion should be diverted from treatment to spending on health education and prevention measures.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

One of the first and most prominent factors of in society's integration is health. Two different prospects perspectives are involved in this issue. The former states that it is rational to allocate a considerable budget to researches into health and prevention measures as well. On the contrary, some believe the first previous attitude is as a waste of money and time. Although both opinions seem reasonable, the first outweighs the latter.

That investing in educational health studies and assigning a corollas-colossal amounts of money toon medical equipment require huge primary expenditure is a fact. This, however, prevents society members from catching the probably succeeding consequences of disease. Nowadays, developed and some developing countries have rebuilt and enhanced their medical infrastructures, albeit with economical difficulties. Indeed, it has been proved that cure is by far some times more expensive than prevention, hence their implementation. For instance, women suffering from breast cancer had not been aware of having cancer unless it spread to the whole body and the immune system wasis disrupted. Today, in the modern communities at least, cancer recognition facilities help prone-susceptible people become informed of their genetic disposition and avoid tumor diffusion before the disease gets getting serious by less expense. In other words, not only does this preventive action benefit patients, also the whole society to maintain fit.

To sum up, maybe perhaps, dedicating a separate budget to the program of developing medicine in both theory and practiceal field seems beyond government income, but it guarantees a higher standard level of living. In my idea, nothing is worth spending your life either financially money-wise or timewisely on healing in bed.
