

Some people think that parents should teach children how to be good members of society. Others, however believe that school is the place to learn this. Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

It is considered by some that parents should teach children to be a good member of society while others hold the opinion that these values should be taught by teachers. I think both have approximately equally significant roles but if I should choose one, I would agree with the idea of parents as effective role-models for their offsprings.

On one hand as psychologists claim, each individual's first years of life are the most important period. It is the time that children start imitating their parents and this is why the way of role-models' impression are-is considerable. Most children obey their parents because they are supported from the early years of their lives and receive the attention and care they ~~(are?)~~ really needed. Thus, parents have sufficient time before beginning the school period to be with their child and make fundamental impression on them.

On the other hand, we have always heard such expression that "school is our second home" , this sentence shows the substantial role of school for each student. Children start obeying their teachers and making friends and also learn how to communicate at school; moreover , they learn a lot from academic courses that might change their future professional life as a member of society. Hence, we cannot ignore the importance of school impact on people of each society.

In the end, I would like to conclude that although both parents and school with the whole environment and stuff-staff are significant in children's social life, but parents are much-extremely impact-influential leaders from very early days of everyone's life; so, they should care and be responsible in teaching their child how to be a good member of society.