

Improvement In health, education and trade are essential for the development of poorer nations. However, the governments of richer nations should take more responsibility for helping the poorer nation in such areas. To what extent do you agree or disagree with this opinion?

Different countries have various styles, circumstances and opportunities of life. In this way, the globe has been divided into two categories: poor countries and rich ones. An attitude is that each nation is responsible for its deleterious or constructive condition. Nonetheless, some believe it is incumbent on advanced countries to help the poorer.

That insisting on the impoverished countries to stand on their own feet has been manifested as a moral action is acceptable. It, however, is a double-edged sword according to the purpose of helping. These days, some greater and more powerful countries are attempting to get poor ones rid of low life quality yes like poverty, illiteracy, war or natural disastrous phenomena whereas there is no financial gain/not such a financial merits for them. Indeed, their effort is for both the humanity and a peaceful future. One the other hand, a number of nations claim that they are doing their best in order to help countries that are in trouble ,but not only do not they not release them from problems, but also put them under more pressure. For instance, many decades ago Russia had alleged to aid Iran to reach in reaching advancement, but the more time passed the more Russian troops entered Iran and more interferences were produced.

Despite the demerits of foreign countries' assistance, associations like UNICEF and UNESCO are applying themselves to promote the standard levels of life for third-world countries, especially in Africa. Status quo disorders have influenced a great number of children's health and these communities are removing the obstacles of for a better life for these defend defenceless-less, innocent little creatures to achieve success in future, albeit lots of deprivations.

To sum up, I opine although the aids of richer countries can play the role of a divine gift to poorer nations, each of us is responsible for our own destiny as human beings. The more responsibility toward our life, the more prosperity and independence.
