The importance of empowering the next generation for society has caused some people to suggest establishing obligatory training programs for parents. Personally, I am one of the people who believe ~~on~~ in this idea by stressing a mandatory process.

Firstly, these days the family circle has shrunk and many times its members live far from each other, therefore new parents do not access ~~their~~ the others' support especially their parents. Not so long ago, relatives, mainly grandparents had a trainer role and helped their children to know responsibilities of being a parent. These trainings had included some practical and theoretical lessons ~~had been~~ taught before giving birth or during upbringing but now, all of this help ~~these hands~~ should be given by childcare training programs. Moreover, although nowadays we have unlimited access to parenting information resources through the Internet and tremendous numbers ~~amount~~ of books, we also need ~~to~~ classes where someone teaches us all these concepts in practice.

Secondly, according to ~~the~~ most psychological researches, parents' behaviour and ways they choose to raise children~~up~~ have irreversible effects on children's life and consequently next generation of the community, and it would be more critical than their genes. When we know this fact, it would be logical to establish some courses to ~~for~~ steer new parents to be better educators and role models and this process could ~~be~~ begin~~began~~ from high school or colleages.

In conclusion, it appears that upbringing is one the most important duties~~y~~ of formation of family and perhaps the main point, so engaging in childcare training schemes would be ~~less~~ the least that can be done ~~as~~ by a parent.
