

Many people move to other countries for work. Children of their families are benefited by this. However, some believe that it affects the children badly. Discuss both views and give your opinion.

These days going to other countries for working as a skilled worker has become easier than the past and even relocating workforces ~~in the~~ most of ~~the~~ time does not need any visa. However, there are a few investigations into effects of this change on people who choose to go and their dependents especially children who are the weakest.

Firstly, the main reason that parents decide to move ~~to~~ other countries for working is ~~involves~~ increasing income, and this increase will change the financial circumstance of a family (~~thereby affecting~~) and consequently it will affect family's members, notably children. A family with a stable economy can plan for the future of its children by spending money on educational equipment and resources, better school or college and investing in courses that prepare useful skills for children. Moreover, going abroad and facing ~~with~~ different cultures and people will widen children's viewpoint ~~to of~~ the world and they will be the more compatible members for society. For instance, the ~~accusation-acquisition~~ of new languages in this process will ~~armed-equip/arm~~ children to be ready for the next era when international communication would be inevitable.

On the other hand, there are some possible side effects for children from family movement to foreign countries for new job opportunities. In many cases, these work permissions are temporary and after a certain time, ~~the~~ whole ~~of~~ family's members have to come back to their own countries and this unsteady condition will not be suitable for raising children. They mentally need ~~a~~ peacefully constant environment for education and social development and these sorts of relocations will cause issues that ~~may~~ finally ~~may end up with~~ ~~lead to~~ mental problems in children. In addition, some cultural shocks would be extremely harmful for younger people. Virtually, cultural diversity is a double-edged sword and if parents could not manage this condition, it could result in bigger issues like social isolations, thereby increasing the chance of depression.

In conclusion, it seems that ~~the~~ decision about moving to other countries for working would be a tricky ~~one~~ and ~~it~~ needs ~~a~~ careful consideration especially for someone who ~~have~~ ~~has~~ children.
