

Some people use the internet to search for solutions to their medical problems. Is it a positive or negative development? Give your own opinion and examples from your experience.

Nowadays using the internet is so common that, people use it in many aspects of their life. As an example, for buying their needs, searching for the best price hotel for their holidays or even for symptoms of illnesses and also their cures. In my estimation, we should not rely on them merely for making a decision~~conclusion~~.

In this rapidly changing world, due to the hectic lifestyle, people rarely refer to the doctor unless they feel the necessity of it. In other words, because of many articles and researches on the internet, people with the appearance of any signs and symptoms of the a disease search the internet, especially educated ones, but I opine that it is not a wise choice. Medically, each patient is a special case that should be treated separately. Whether we believe it or not, we must accept that any disease or any drug in any person has specific effects and they depend on the individual's body.

Other than that, in spite of the fact that internet-based information is practical and useful~~one~~, it is sometimes misleading. To put it simply, it acts like a double-edged sword, because much many of their idioms/phrases~~terminology~~ isare specialized and may make us misguided~~mistaken~~. Not only can we not find relevant details, but we also may be are confused or upset. It will-is incumbent on us to go to the doctor, if we notice any unusual evidence~~development/change~~ in our body.

In a nut shell, that the internet provides us with a new world with a large amount of information is indisputable, but we are not capable enough of either understanding or analyzing the information around us in terms of our limited knowledge, so we should benefit from specialists especially in the field of our health.