

Some people think that in the modern world we are more dependent on each other, while others think that people have become more independent.

While human society ~~have~~ has been interdependent from the earliest times and many experts see us as the most interrelated creatures in the world, nowadays some people believe that we have become more independent owing to huge changes in the way of living.

From ~~one~~ a point of view, by modern developments especially in technology, people ~~would~~ are ~~be~~ more powerful and self-reliant. We have a lot of tools and equipment that help us to do ~~their~~ our jobs independently and it would not be so far when we could have several robots that would serve ~~on~~ in our homes and workplaces. Moreover, comprehensive social security and services provide wide ranges of services that it seems that nobody needs ~~to~~ other people's existence. Even in emotional conditions, there would be some solutions like taking a pill or escaping to virtual reality cameras.

On the other hands, although advantages in the modern life have provided priceless welfare for most ~~of~~ people, many argue that these modern gifts have weakened today's humans. In the past, a small community like a family could manage all its needs by itself and the family's members were able to live in an isolated area with less communication with others groups. For instance, consider an imaginary situation that one person would be alone in a jungle or on an island just with simple tools but with access to a lot of natural resources. Unable to use our hands to handle simple tasks, most of us do not know any basic survival skill. It would seem that living in modern cities ~~have~~ has resulted in ~~the~~ heavy dependency on other people's services and ~~produces~~ products so that we cannot even find something to eat or drink without others' helps.

In conclusion, while these days we are ~~drawing~~ mostly drowning in welfare and technology and all needs are fulfilled, it should be noted that this level of prosperity does not means that we are independent but unlikeby contrast, it means most of us have forgotten basic life skills and get these services from others and it means a sadly irreversible dependency.
