

Countries are becoming more and more similar because people are able to buy the same products anywhere in the world.

Do you think this is a positive or negative development?

Due to technological progress, people are living in a high-tech era. They are easily in contact with each other from all over the world. This situation ~~leads~~ has led to ~~becoming/growing~~ similarity in their products ~~similar~~. Some researchers assume that the lack of varieties in the world is a dreary and unwelcome prospect and others assert otherwise.

First and ~~for most~~ foremost, the widening gap between people from diverse corners of the world will fade. The more similarity in properties, the closer friendship in countries. In this way, individuals are equipped ~~by~~ with numerous facilities and are capable of living in a much more convenient place. The case in point is drugs are a necessary need for people who suffer from different diseases and are provided easily.

On the other hand, further analysis reveals some drawbacks regarding the given statement. That producing and ~~selling~~ selling handicrafts provides large numbers of ~~job~~ vacancies for inhabitants is an indisputable fact. ~~At the sight of~~ Visiting huge numbers of foreign manufactured, members of the public will grow less ~~impelled~~ impelled to buy the local ones that would be a pivotal cause to forget the traditional customs. From my point of view, traditions are as glues that keep each society together. that is why, if they were forgotten, there would be an enormous separation between individuals.

By way of conclusion, I, personally, ~~claim~~ maintain we should not forget the deleterious effects of this bland situation in the world. Only when authorities strike a balance between consuming local and foreign items, will the country be protected against the negative aspects of ~~likelihood~~ sameness/likeness in the environment.
