

Written by M.Torabi

In order for the world to be a “greener” place, punishments and fines for environmentally unfriendly acts committed by individuals need to be more severe?

To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Today, the importance of the environment is obvious to everyone and all people know that the quality of their lives is related to their environmental conditions. In spite of this fact, some lucrative-or-profitableprofit-driven people do not value it. Therefore, rigorous policies are needed to prevent them from damaging the environment or at least to reduce it.

Scientific researches has shown-have been showing that the creation and exploitation of natural resources is a long-term process. For instance, oak forest utilization takes something about 100 years. But destroying it only takes a few minutes. Hence, to save the environment, there must be restrictive policies. A look at the environmental situation shows the need for a more severe encounter. Complete supervision on construction has to be mandatory and if a case is found trespassing the limitation, strict action must be taken.

In addition of-to the above discussion, many of damages are committed by people who are reckless to the environment. Such destructions which are done by individuals can be reduced by both teaching and punishing. Educational programs play an important role especially on children. More severe fines for people who harm the environment or using them for rebuilding the environment as punishments can be effective solutions.

Considering this fact that environmental damaging will have a lot of consequences and restoration of the natural resources needs financial budgets, the money which will be earned from fines, must be used for-to the environmental recovery. Building or developing the green spaces in the vicinity of residential areas is an example from-of actions that can be done.

In conclusion, our environment is very valuable to our lives and its reconstruction-recovery is expensive and time consuming. So, caring of-for the environment is everyone’s duty, and by applying more severe punishments and fines besides the educational programs we can must protect it. Financial resources from fines can be used with this goal.