

Recently, the age differences between parents and their children have turned into a very controversial issue which has been discussed by so many psychologists and family experts as well. Some believe that the less age difference exists, the better generation gap is handled. Since this is not the only criterion dealt with the children training case, ~~hence~~ other factors such as behavioral resistance, sufficient education and financial ~~affordance~~ affordability are significant factors, which take considerable time for parents to achieve, play a significant role in upbringing of well-adjusted children.

First of all, behavioral resistance which does not occur but after time, is an important proof of responsible parents. It is crystal clear that the time needed for an individual, reaching ~~to~~ a stable point of behavior is not deniable. Moreover, evidence shows that children have been well-brought up by the parents who showed up with ~~resisted~~ consistent behavior rather than the opposite who are challenged with their own experience of behaving at the time.

Secondly, sufficient education in hand is a noticeable element that parents can utilize in order to train their children. Never would there be enough time for very young parents to foster a child and acquire desired knowledge simultaneously. This can lead to serious consequences which might happen as a result/Therefore, the impact of less or non-educated parents as the result of time is not avoidable.

~~The~~ last but not ~~the~~ least, is the financial ~~affordance~~ affordability. Regardless of the inherently rich families, young parents need some time to relatively empower their economical bases for a relief-comfortable life to be provided after child's birth.

To ~~bring the discussion into halt~~ sum up, although generation gap is not an ~~ignorable~~ insignificant element of training children, whilst other factors have been fulfilled, parents would be able to benefit ~~of~~ from a well training environment for their children.
