

Some people believe that a great difference in age between parents and children is more beneficial. Do you think the advantages of a greater difference in age between them outweigh the disadvantages?

There is a range of different opinions around the issue of the ideal age for becoming parents which plays a significant role in terms of age difference between the child and his caregivers. Some advocates the idea of becoming a mother/father in elder-older periods of their life in favor of serving a well-equipped condition to the offspring, while others hold the opposite point of view in order to avoid health problems.

First and foremost, it is worth mentioning that being a parent in late 30's of each individual is more likely to offer financial supports; As long as, most of the aged couples are well-educated or shaped in their career, so they are far prone to build a better-prepared life for the child, mundanely speaking. Moreover, the older you grow, the better you identify yourself as an independent character, this-that is why older parents seem more patient and take better steps to overcome any difficulties. This is not to say that being an older caretaker is all sunshine and roses, but it possesses enough advantages for a qualified parenthood.

On the other side, opponents are concerned about ~~for~~ the biological clock of each person deciding to be a parent. They hold the opinion that although young people might not be as supportive parents as the elder ones, they are more energetic to keep up with busy children and their everyday challenges. That young individuals are less likely to have problems related to the health, ~~is a given fact~~ needless to point out. therefore, biologically speaking, it is far safer to become a mother or father in younger ages.

By way of conclusion, the two sides of the coin are worth ~~to be being~~ considered. In other words, both biologically and psychologically the stances are quite significant. There is an ideal time-frame like 30's of each individual that is a sort of middle-ground between the potential pitfalls and benefits. At any rate, I firmly believe in balanced points of views but if I should choose just one utmost-single option, my opinion would be more inclined to the elder-older age parenthood in nowadays-today's life.
