

Sanaz Namdar

Topic:

Nowadays, people move from one country to another for work. Some people think children of these families suffer because of this, while others think it is helpful for them.

Discuss both views and give your opinion.

The recent developments have caused the globalization phenomenon having to have rendered people with numbers of job opportunities in foreign territories, and hence people's immigration together with their family members. Some are for this notion whilst others put more emphasis on its detrimental effects. From my point of view, with-by considering all aspects of this trend, people can reduce its demerits and reap the benefits of its long-term merits.

Migrating to overseas along with their families in part due to obtaining more job opportunities sounds more beneficial in terms of the children of these families. First and foremost, by working in foreign countries people can earn higher incomes leading to an improvement in the level of family's welfare and economic conditions. Secondly, since globalization has enriched some of the developed countries with ample jobs where most people immigrate to, they provide their children with more appropriate educational facilities compared to their homelands, so they can broaden their horizon that—which developsfostering their talents in some novel areas. In addition, it may even be plausible for them to study in world-class elite universities. Last but not least, they can acquire second language and make new friends. Furthermore, it is well-documented that children can assimilate into and adjust with-to other cultures far more easily and quickly in comparison with their adults.

On the other hand, the opponents of this trend insist on its dire effects on offsprings. This complete transformation results in facing a different lifestyle and culture of the locals. Their new situations including schools, teachers, classmates, and the language will make them perceive that they are in the different world. This mental unprecedented strain has a huge number of ramifications ~~at~~for children. They may be dejected and even have some negative consequences on their education. If they cannot handle these cultural shocks or even language barrier experiencing during the relocation, they may not assimilate into their new societies ~~having arisen~~which may arise in some countries. To illustrate, the next generation of African settlers in some European countries ~~does~~do not feel that they are ~~a~~ part of their societies so that the statistics of crimes ~~boost~~are rising among these communities.

In conclusion, although there are some various views about bringing children with their parents to migrate to other countries for working, I personally advocate this notion due the aforementioned reasons.