

Nowadays, people move from one country to another. Some people think children of these families suffer because of this, while others think it is helpful for them. Discuss both views and give your opinion.

In recent decades, migration has become a pressing issue. There is a range of questions as to whether children, who follow their parents and leave their home ground for a new country to live in, benefit from locating-settling in a new situation as an immigrant or face lots of harmful implements-implications which outweigh its merits. Although this issue have-has both pros and cons that some, myself included me, side with demerits and its detrimental effects as a dominant view.

It is better to start off with defective-damaging impacts of immigration that opponents criticize in regards of cultural shock and financial problems. Migration plays a pivotal role in children's life as aliens in the host country. For example, language barrier may cause constraints that might influence on-kids' communication within society straightforwardly; such social exclusions pose a threat in-with regards of to lowering self-esteem and keeping distance from the mainstream of society; In other words, these impacts ruin almost all that an individual needs to succeed in-later in life. Moreover, the-new-comers-are-imposed a lot of in economic pressure is imposed on newcomers and they are deprived from-of basic services as a citizen for sum-of-a-period a while. Occurring-occurrence of such changes for a child who is not mature enough to perceive the points of challenges means a lot that might promise a dim future she would not expect-for.

Advocates, However, are pointing the-much more of a positive perspective out. They hold the belief that emigrants, especially the ones who left their low or middle level developing countries for an industrialized one, would be more likely to possess a life with a higher quality in education, health and economy for good. It is crystal clear that kids in early years of their life are far prone to adopt the altered life they are circled by, and the ones with talents and aptitudes could be sure that they are on a fertile ground for educational and job opportunities for the years ahead.

By way of conclusion, a new life abroad is both a curse and opportunity and only if individuals know how to adjust and gain benefit from the new condition, could they succeed in the future life, otherwise, difficulties mentioned above would lead them to a fruitless life ahead. All in all, I hold the view of the former paragraph that is convinced-the-mentioned drawbacks of migration are superior-more-serious-thanto its advantages.
