

Nowadays, the media provide a great deal of information about famous persons' personal lives. Although ~~this kind~~these kinds of programmes are popular among audiences, some people argue that the media should focus on common people, instead of celebrities. From my perspective, this notion would be true, and in this essay I will set out to explain why.

It seems to be an undeniable fact that mass media play a significant role in modern society, ~~in fact,~~ they not only provide people with various information, but also have influence on their behavior. For instance, documentaries based on a true story of successful ~~person's~~persons' life will encourage ordinary people to do hard and their best. Another example of the vital role of the media is informing people about decisions made by the governments. In other words, people have a right to know what is happening all over the world, and response-respond to wrong policies.

On the other hand, the media tend to report sensational news about private life of celebrities with the aim of being entertaining, however it would ~~has~~have some destructive impacts. Firstly, for many young adults celebrities are heroes and examples to follow. Therefore, if they compare themselves to their favorite celebrity, they will feel disappointed. Secondly, famous people deserve privacy. As long as they are followed by journalismspaparazzi, they are not able to be calm in their life.

As far as I am concerned, the media should pay excessive attention to the subjects associated with common people, as the main mission of the media is providing beneficial reports.

To sum up, even though most people are attracted to celebrities' news, the media have a duty to report about ordinary people in order to be persuasive.
