

Living in a country where you have to speak a foreign language can cause serious social problems, as well as practical problems. To what extent do you agree or disagree with the statement?

Nowadays immigration is one of the most debatable issues of many people especially in the Middle East. It's an important venture and demands specific arrangements for people who have to deal with difficulties on their ways. In my opinion, the hardest part of living in a foreign country is the language. Although a person may have numerous qualities, without knowing the language of destination country may face many problems in social and professional communications.

For living in a foreign country, an important consideration, however, is that one should adapt himself to new society and environment. To this end, he needs to make contact with people by using the common language. Communication is an effective method for everyone all over the world to present their being and their ideas to others from the beginning of the existence of human kinds and today one of the keys to success is to know as many languages as possible.

As far as I am concerned, learning the destination country's language, is not only ~~is~~ a necessity but also ~~it is~~ a priority that suggests the allure of a better life and future with many privileges to the person. Obviously, there are many other factors which lead the person's life to be in the right direction. I believe the language enhance the confidence which develop the sense of pride and assist people to cope with their other difficulties.

In conclusion, even with all the efforts in destination country, people may face problems yet needing to be solved. ~~Either-whether~~ believing in prosperity of a foreign country or better job opportunities, leaving your own country for good is one of the hardest decisions of life.
