The Olympic Games could have several undeniably effective roles in peoples' life. It has sparked a heated debate among researchers some of whom assume that in the current century it is not of the great importance and is just a way of wasting time and money. Some others, however, assert vice versa. I, personally, wholeheartedly agree with the latter group. This short essay elaborates on this controversial issue.

First and foremost, watching these games through media, viewers will be encouraged to put doing regular exercise in their daily programs which is an effective way for having a healthy life style and even it prevents individuals from becoming overweight. Further and even more importantly, participants get familiar with an array of members of the public from all over the world and with diverse cultures. They can take numerous advantages from this relationship. A research, done in south of Canada, reveals that a group of young generations who either-like either watching these competitions or attending them are significantly more rounded people as an-adults and more successful in their personal life. That is why, not only are the Olympic games not just competitions, but it also place a wide range of benefits on the life of individuals engaged in them.

On the other hand, proponents opine that the technological facility like the internet has faded boundaries between countries. In this way, the Olympic Games have not any effective role in the world and it could be just a way of wasting time and money. In addition, nowadays people are leading a hectic life style and do not have enough time for these activities.

On the whole, I once again reaffirm my position with regard to the beneficial effects of the Olympic Games on members of the public's life over this century.
