Many governments think that economic progress is their most important goal. Some people, however, think that other types of progress are equally important for a country

The issue of whether a country should prioritize economic growth over other developments or not is certainly a contentious one. While there are valid arguments to the contrary, in this essay I would contend that it should place a premium on growing financial resources rather than other progressions.

One the one hand, in order to survive from wildly difficult problems associated with modern and fast-paced society ranging from environmental, healthy as well as security difficulties, it is vitally essential that any government should implement all its obligations in all sense of word. Countries are delicate arrangements where all parts depend on each other and they need comprehensive management to be sustainable. Taken for granted, each sector can undermine society in its way. In other words, all these components should be considered in managing, otherwise an ineffecient country.

On the other hand, in my belief the most important part of management in a country is its financial resources which should be gradually increased through every possible effort to cover its costs and peoples' welfare as well as invest in the way of prosperity. If a country could not afford its economic requirements, any concern about other necessities and deleterious problems which are contingent on making money become irrelevant. Furthermore, it is through economic progress that government can promote healthcare and educational practices needing a budget as a prerequisite.

In conclusion, I once again restate any view that attempting in the economic growth is inherently worthwhile for the government. Not only does it meet its peoples' needs, but it can also invest in improvements and innovations as well as contribute in international charity works, hence a homogeneous society with accessible goals in a good financial health.