

- Some people think that parents should teach children how to be good members of society. Others, however, believe that school is the place to learn this.
- Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

There is no doubt that one of the critical skills that children need to learn during their rearing period is learning how to be a good member in society. There are people believing that its parents remit to teach their children how to be a descent person in society. Another group of people opine schools are the places that kids need to learn morale and being a descent member. This essay attempts to elaborate the key roles of both parents and school.

First, it should be considered that the primary society a child gets to know is home and the very first members of that society are his/her parents regardless of responsibility of parents for nurturing their kids in various areas. Thereby, learning morale and proper behavior starts at home where is the first school. It is claimed by several psychological researches that the first six years of a child are critical since the foundation of their character will be formed. Then, considering above-mentioned theories, it can easily be inferred that parents have a key role in rearing socially acceptable members. For example, children learn respect from their parents since they will practice it by respecting their parents.

Second, it is vivid to majority of people that school is where kids will grow and their skills will be fostered over the span of time by learning. Then, being a descent person in society is part of all other skills that a child will attain at school. It is clearly assumed that school constitute around twelve years of kids' training, and plays a vital role in their nurturing. As an example, children will get to know how to express their ideas and feelings while respecting diversity of their peers.

In conclusion, it is reiterated that both parents and schools play vital roles in nurturing descent members of society. There might be priority in their roles, but with no doubt both play their part.
