According to a recent survey, the more time people use the internet, the less time they spend with real human beings. Should we worry about the effect this is having on social interaction or should we see the internet as a way of opening up new communication possibilities worldwide. What are your views?

Nowadays Using internet seems to be unavoidable, and all of us with looking around ourselves realize that how rapidly internet has altered the features of communication. In light of social and psychological effect of spending time in internet and consequently spend less time with real human beings, I fully agree with this view that we should worry about using internet.

I don't deny the benefits of using internet, such as fast access to information, finding the answer of every question with just a simple search on internet or lots of practical applications on our cellphones. Furthermore with the help of social network , we expnad the dominant of our relation, we could make friends with a person on the other side of the earth and recognize other cultures and style of life, which is not possible without internet.

  But in my opinion all of these relations and communications are not real. After turning off your cellphone, you are really/virtually alone. It's obviously right to say that internet disconnected people who are near each other, because they are so busy with different entertainments on internet or they are in contact with the other people who are far from one another. For instance, in parties or gatherings people are more busy with internet than speaking with each other. ~~Unfortunetly~~ Unfortunately there is no time for exchanging ideas, feelings, facts or impressions, just because of spending time in internet.

Finally, regarding all of positive and negative aspects of using internet and it's effect on communications and relations, I believe that like every new phenomenon or technology, we should learn the culture of using it in our routin life. Although there are more benefits than drawbacks to using internet for finding new way of commuinication, but we should make/strike a balance between real social interaction and internet communication for not missing being with real human.