

People think that those moving to a new country should accept the new culture in the foreign country. Others think that they should live as a separate minority group with different lifestyle.

Nowadays, development of transportation has led to being closer to each other. Some people try to move to another country for variant reasons. Some people argue the foreigners should obey the culture of the country where they live now. Reversely, some individuals assert they should be allowed to have their own culture.

Some people believe when someone lives in a different country as a foreigner, they must follow the regulations. Besides, traditions may be forgotten due to new cultures are brought by aliens.

Canada, Australia and USA are some countries where varieties of people with different cultures live together. Although everyone should respect the others' cultures, it should not be against the laws. Had the government passed the bills about migration restriction, the foreigners would not have travelled excessively. Thus, this procedure could improve the unity.

On the other hand, people who migrated to another country opine they have the right to have their own traditions. Not only should not anyone disrespect them but also the government ought to support their cultures. In addition, their cultures can be attractive for the others. For instance, Chinese New Year ceremony is a tourist attraction in some countries. However, minority foreigners have their own right to hold their traditions albeit with the permission of the authority.

In conclusion, I personally believe all cultures should be respected otherwise some conflicts may occur. By contrast, the government should monitor the situation lest someone ^{should} transgresses the laws.

Both minority and majority of beliefs should be revered. Plus, obeying the rules is the basic factor which everybody must do that.
