

Is everyone entitled to free health care? Or should people pay for it?

That eating unhealthy foods and having a sedentary lifestyle lead to people suffering from a variety of diseases is an irrefutable fact. This situation has sparked a heated debate among researchers. Some of them assume that the duty of providing individuals with a free system of curing their illnesses is directly incumbent on the government. By contrast, some others frown upon the aforementioned idea and assert that people should pay the cost of their body/physical health on their own. I, personally, mention that free curing sick members of the public should be provided for some citizens with a lower income. This short essay will elaborate on this contentious issue.

First and foremost, sick people are prone to different stresses, hence their illness. That is why only when the government reduce the causes of anxiety, do they grow ensure about being capable of solving the problem of high costs of treatment. Further and even more importantly is associated with the tendency to tax evasion. Paying great sums of money to the hospital, individuals will be reluctant to paying tax. It means that in this way, citizens feel that the authorities treat them unfairly.

On the other hand, researchers frowning upon the free health care facilities think that the government had better instead of allotting money to offering gratis health facilities, allocate the same amount of money to resolving other issues in society such as public transportation systems.

On the whole, from my point of view, authorities would rather legislate some laws as to categorizing different strata of society based on their incomes and choose the lower income people for exposing to the free cure system.
