

Many people leave their homes in the countryside to live in large cities.

What factors make people want to move to the city? How realistic is it to control the numbers of people moving to the city?

Today, many citizens migrate from the countryside to settle in capital or large cities, the reason of this phenomenon is most of facilities ,work opportunities ,universities and shopping center congregates in cities.

There are many factors make younger people in the range of 18 to 40 years old to leave their homes in the countryside such as migrate for search and find a better job, well-paying work and study in a main universities with an expert teacher , equipped laboratories and workshops , for the older citizens and people who have a disability live in the countryside are difficult , because usually countryside don't have many facilities for this group to have an easy movement and comfortable life.

Also many younger people who live in the countryside become boring, because they don't have any exciting moment in their life, lack of entertainment's place for instance cinema , theatre saloon and shopping center force them to move to the cities to enjoying and spend their time in the city's atmosphere.

In conclusion, if government have an investment and the political will to improve facilities for older and disable people, extend the university and entertainment place and job opportunities for younger people, this migration will be decrease and most of citizens will encourage to live in their own cities, otherwise this is an evitable migration and it has bad consequences for the government.
