Parents today are more involved in their children's education than were parents in the past. Agree or disagree?

When I was younger, I would definitely have said that parents back then were not involved in their children's education as much as parents today are, but no longer do I think that way and I am not agree with the above statement.

First of all, although getting involved in children's education is not only a bad idea, but rather sometimes it is necessary and is a key factor for their brain to develop, but modern parents have much more responsibility than parents in the past. Their career and modern life takes so much of their time and energy which is why they cannot involve in their children's school works despite themselves. For instance, my parents tried their best to join me in my school works in order for me to be more successful in my education, but they did not do the same thing for my sister who is 10 years younger than me because they were busy enough with their jobs and some other issues.

Secondly, based on some surveys which have been done on some school-kids, kids of this generation were growing faster than those of other generation. It means that these day kids are more clever than kids in the past and they can do their education stuffs by themselves and do not need much help. Moreover, schools today have more efficient techniques for teaching children and kids and they can get involve in their peers' schoolwork and help them with their education problems and vice versa. For example, I can remember that my sister's school offered my parents to let my sister stay longer at the school in order to help her with her school works.

On the other hand, by not involving in our children's education we lose our connection with our children in some ways and we cannot lead or help them with their school issues and make our parent role to fade in their lives. Some people believe that parents today are aware of this phenomenon and try to involve in their children's education more than past.

In conclusion, nothing can fill parents' place in children's life, so parents should try their best in facing with modern life problems and get involve in every part of their children's life.
