

Countries are becoming more and more similar because people are able to buy the same products anywhere in the world

Do you think this is a positive or negative development?

At this point in time, hardly, do individuals could recognize the other's nationalities, on account of the fact that they are extremely resemble each other. This phenomenon, however, leads societies to be poised on the brink of the a disaster.

Although advocates of this practice attribute that to the concept of "global village", it brings about a large number of goods be imported into countries, some of which contradict the social convention of the destinations, and eventually so called "culture invasion" would emerge in the near future in these countries. Besides, it could jeopardise a nation's identity, given that the masses are enormously partial to follow the latest trend of fashion, which is not aligned with their tradition, the significance that is nowadays tend to be ignored.

On the other hand, this phenomenon would attenuate the domestic commodities without a doubt. That is to say, producers would financially afflicted, and consequently countries will face an ailing economy. It has been observed worldwide that numerous local companies undergo the dispiriting experience of the bankruptcy. Moreover, creativity is narrowed to the particular experts, who invent novel items for the enterprises, which dominate a vast number of countries. This fact would play an important role in decrease of the job vacancies, which similarly could prejudice the economy of the countries, let alone entity's sprints.

In conclusion, contrary to the some socialists who cite that this recently occurred event will lay a groundwork for development of the nations, it poses insurmountable threads, some of which would cause breakdown of communities in cultural and economic spheres.
